Dear members / of Bradford Sports Club,/

As you all know, / it's been a month / since Bradford Sports Club opened for business.

We are truly grateful / that so many people have decided / to come to our facility / and enjoy our services.

To show / our appreciation, / we are planning / to give something to you / in return.

So, / we would like to invite you / to our free trial classes / for tennis, swimming, and yoga.

We hope / to see you soon.

Thank you.

When Jennifer entered the museum, / her eyes widened.

She had never seen / so many huge bones / before.

“Welcome / everyone. / We hope / you enjoy our new exhibit,” / her tour guide said.

Jennifer didn’t know anything / about dinosaurs, / but she couldn’t wait to hear / more about them / now.

There were skeletons / and pictures of them / everywhere.

She listened closely / as the tour guide talked about each one.

When her group finished / going around the exhibit, / the tour guide asked / if anyone had any questions.

Jennifer’s hand shot up into the air / in response.

She was so excited / to learn more.

We tend to make friends / with people / who share our interests.

It is comforting / to be surrounded by people / with personalities / similar to our own.

While this urge may be natural, / it is actually unhealthy.

Specifically, / it can result / in the development / of a very narrow worldview.

This is why / experts encourage people / to seek out individuals / from different backgrounds / to form friendships with.

Doing so / opens us up to new experiences / and improves our communication skills.

It also helps us to learn / how to cooperate / with those we disagree with.

This is an important ability / to have / in the environments / where we spend time / with a variety of people.

Therefore, / when you look for / new friends, / get out of your bubble.

When we choose / to do something, / it's easy to think about the advantages / that we will get.

However, / the value of other choices / is also important.

If we use our time / to do one thing, / then we can't use it / to do something else.

This is called / opportunity cost.

Imagine that / someone who makes a lot of money / needs to clean her house.

If she did it / herself, / she wouldn't have to pay / a cleaning person.

But / at the same time, / she also wouldn't be able to work / and make money.

So, / it would make sense / if she paid someone / to clean the house / while she earned / a large amount of money.

Thus, / we should consider / what the other options cost / when we make a decision.

Psychologist Elton Mayo tried to find out / if certain changes in a work situation / would affect / how well employees perform.

So, / he observed / two groups of people / at work.

For one group, / he kept the same schedule and environment / from before.

However, / for the other group, / he would make changes / such as adjusting the break times / or the lighting / of the factory.

Mayo was surprised to find that / the productivity of the group / in the altered situation / increased.

This even happened / when the changes appeared to be negative, / like making the room / that people worked in / darker.

In fact, / when different things kept changing, / the participants felt like / someone was concerned / about their work behavior / or environment.

The employees felt / the need / to work harder / as a result.

In other words, / they tried to improve / how they worked / because of the attention.

I stared at the field / and began to sweat.

It was my first day / of practice / with a new team.

I saw a group of girls / and slowly walked up to them.

My stomach felt heavy / when I asked, / “Are you the girl’s soccer team?”

“Yes,” / one of them replied.

“You must be Sarah! / We’re so happy / to meet you!”

All of the girls smiled at me / and began to ask me questions.

They were all so easy / to talk to.

We played after that, / and I couldn’t stop laughing / the entire time.

It was the best soccer practice / I had ever had.

If you are on a team, / it's a good idea / to cook in your own kitchen.

Each person on a team / has a job.

Also, / everyone has strengths / and weaknesses.

On a good team, / everyone is doing something / that they are skilled at.

For example, / if you have a talent / for doing calculations, / then you might be in charge of the tasks / that use numbers.

Another team member / who is very artistic / might do all of the jobs / with images.

However, / the team will be less productive / if you ignore your own tasks / to help the artistic person.

Even though you are trying / to do a nice thing, / art is not your strong point.

So, / stay focused on the tasks / you do best, / and your team will work together / efficiently.

We do many things / to save water.

We might take quick showers / or turn off the faucet / while we brush our teeth.

However, / the water we use at home / is only a tiny part / of our water footprints.

A huge part of our water use / actually result from / the food we eat.

For example, / it takes around 900 gallons of water / to produce one normal-sized steak.

This is because / cows have to eat / so many crops, / and these crops take so much water / to grow.

Other meats and dairy products / also require a lot of water / to produce.

In comparison, / fruits and vegetables usually take very little water / to produce.

This shows / how our diets shape / our overall water usage.
